He added that "hateful racial stereotyping has no place in Israel," the Hebrew-language Walla site reported. The racist comments were directed at a seven-year-old Israeli American girl, who was reportedly ill when she was captured on video saying "I hate Jews." The video of the incident was shared on Israel's Bezeq news sites, which reported that it was filmed in Brooklyn, New York. One of the video's social media posts included a picture of the girl with a caption that said "I hate Jews," the Times of Israel 0cc13bf012

Tumor cell-based assays are used for the diagnosis of various diseases including cancer. The current practice of diagnosing cancer by histopathological examination of biopsies has its limitations such as diagnosis at a late stage and the lack of non-invasive techniques for evaluating tumor status. Thus, the field is moving towards the identification of new markers and the development of new techniques using cell line-based models. In this review, we discuss recent advances in cancer markers which are in use as (1) transmembrane proteins, (2) secreted proteins, (3) cell-surface receptors, (4) circulating proteins, and (5) metabolic proteins. In addition, we explore new methods for studying cancer-related cellular processes by using cell-line-based assays.[Diagnostic imaging of pulmonary tuberculosis: a comparison of MDCT with PET/CT]. The wide dissemination of multidrug-resistant tuberculosis (MDR-TB) and the association with HIV infection has significantly increased the need for accurate diagnostic methods for pulmonary tuberculosis. In this paper the authors report on the differences between high-resolution computed tomography (HRCT), positron emission tomography/computed tomography (PET/CT), and other diagnostic methods in the diagnosis of pulmonary tuberculosis. Thirty-nine patients with pulmonary tuberculosis were examined by HRCT and PET/CT within 10 days of each other. Patients with lymphoma, sarcoidosis, lung cancer, and lung emphysema were excluded. The final diagnosis of tuberculosis was based on clinical and x-ray findings, mycobacterial and histological findings, or a positive Mantoux test. Patients with proven or probable tuberculosis were treated according to the results of the imaging studies. In the first examination, the initial suspicion for tuberculosis was set by HRCT. For PET/CT the methionine-labeled radiopharmaceutical FDG was administered, and imaging was performed at rest and under exercise. With all imaging methods, a standard chest x-ray and laboratory tests were performed simultaneously. In the first stage of the study, 35 of the 39 patients were diagnosed correctly. In 2 patients with proven or probable tuberculosis
