The present invention relates generally to apparatus and method for high frequency high velocity projectiles, and more particularly to a substantially non-brittle, solid projectile comprising a hollow, rigid, hollow-walled tubular body having a hollow interior filled with a plastically deformable inert gas such as helium, and a nose having a central passage therethrough, which nose is imperforate and has a small diameter to resist cavitation. 2. Description of the Prior Art Traditionally, munitions have been either ammunition such as rockets, grenades, and the like, or warheads fired by rockets or missiles. In both of these types of devices, it is customary to enclose the warhead or rocket motor in an enclosure. The prime function of these enclosures is to ensure that the warhead or rocket motor is not subjected to excessive pressure, vibrations or acceleration, in order to prevent the explosion of the warhead or motor. It is known to enclose the warhead or rocket motor with an outer shell or jacket made of a strong, non-conducting material, and to fill the hollow space between the outer shell and the warhead or rocket motor with a non-conducting material such as an elastomeric or polymeric material. These non-conducting materials are chosen to avoid shock or kinetic energy transfer to the warhead or rocket motor which would otherwise cause the warhead or rocket motor to explode from the pressure or kinetic energy exerted upon the warhead or rocket motor. It is also known to fill the hollow space with a soft plastic material to improve the performance of the warhead or motor by dissipating the impact forces applied to the warhead or motor. There are a number of problems associated with the use of non-conducting fillers such as elastomers. One problem is that non-conducting fillers can allow a buildup of static charge on the warhead or motor, and in some cases these static charges can cause the warhead or motor to explode. Another problem with the use of non-conducting fillers is that they are often fragile and brittle in nature
