We have investigated the P(m-n) surface structure of NaCl(m) layers on a glycine layer formed from the ZnO(110)/ODE system by using an angle-dependent Kelvin probe force microscopy (KPFM) and ultraviolet photoelectron spectroscopy (UPS). KPFM is a well-known method for detecting the interaction between a probe and a sample surface. The present KPFM system allows multiple KPFM measurements on the surface simultaneously. The amount of NaCl molecules in the topmost layer was estimated from the number of nanoscale conductance fluctuations observed in the system, using the "multiplication method". The fractional area occupied by atoms in the NaCl(m) layer was determined from the probability of NaCl attachment to Zn atoms and the short-range order of NaCl under the surface. The corresponding KPFM scans show that the interface between the ZnO(110) and the glycine layers is irregular and disordered. The fractional area occupied by Na atoms in the topmost layer of the glycine layer is 0.02 with some Na adatoms at the interface. The interface between the ZnO(110) and the NaCl(m) layers is smooth and ordered. The fractional area occupied by Na atoms in the topmost layer of NaCl is 0.15 and the topmost layer is almost immobile. The particle size distribution of Na atoms also suggests the stable growth of NaCl. The results imply that Na atoms can grow in the ZnO(110) layer formed in the ZnO(110)/ODE system at the interface between the ZnO(110) and the NaCl(m) layer.. More to the point, based on the evidence adduced at trial, the injury to Mrs. Riggs was an inevitable, foreseeable and ordinary
