Temporal and spatial expression of PCSK9 in the developing chick embryo. Low-density lipoprotein receptor (LDLR) is the primary target for proprotein convertase subtilisin/kexin type 9 (PCSK9), a hepatocyte-secreted protein, which plays a crucial role in degradation of the LDLR. In this study we aimed to determine the developmental profile of PCSK9 and its function in chick embryos. Reverse transcription (RT)-PCR demonstrated that PCSK9 was expressed at low levels in whole embryos on embryonic day (E) 1, while large amounts of PCSK9 mRNA were expressed in the liver on E8. Using whole-mount in situ hybridization, we detected PCSK9 transcripts in the visceral endoderm cells on E3 to E5. Furthermore, in E6 PCSK9 transcripts were abundant in the liver primordium and in the extra-embryonic region. Interestingly, during retinoic acid (RA)-induced somite boundary formation, PCSK9 transcripts were expressed at the lower boundary between somites and notochord. These results suggest that PCSK9 plays various roles in chick development, in addition to LDLR regulation.
