Project 59 (or Beretta XR39) is a handgun cartridge developed by Federico Magli of Beretta and his team, with Peter Tafuri and Steve Merio. It was introduced at a gun exhibition in New York on November 29, 2009, and presented as a showcase of new future development projects. The XR39 9 mm cartridge is a long cylindrical 9 mm derivative of the.40 S&W. Based upon the.40 S&W after firing the.357 Magnum cartridge, the cartridge also uses a lengthened case made by expanding the case of the .40 S&W by using a different neck size. Beretta claims that the new 9 mm cartridge is designed for a more powerful round than the existing 9 mm cartridge. The idea was to enable the .357 SIG-based 9mm sub-compact carbines to be carried in the same bulletproof vests as standard 9 mm firearms and to close the market gap which has so far remained for a 9 mm sub-compact but that has so far not been offered by Beretta. The new cartridge project was announced at the New York International Invitational Gun Show on November 29, 2009. As it was announced that Beretta had already decided to stop selling the 9 mm sub-compact models and instead focus on the full-size 9 mm, the cartridge has recently been redesigned as a higher power cartridge with a grander chambering, with the smaller capacity sub-compact models being phased out. Production Although the new cartridge project was announced on November 29, 2009, the first domestic production sample guns were produced early in 2011. The guns were made available for purchase by the Beretta U.S.A. distributors. At the same time, Brazilian production of XR39 was launched in January 2013. In August 2015, Beretta received 461 XR39 pistols from the new Brazilian factory, making them the first pistols of this caliber, manufactured in Brazil, where the XR39 are currently sold in great quantities. Overview Design The XR39 is a 9 mm Cartridge designed for use in subcompact and compact handguns with an automatic-only firing mechanism in the 380 mm caliber, in order to utilize standard magazines such as the popular Glock models. The cartridge has been designed to be a 9 mm precision firearm cartridge, specifically as a replacement for the 9 mm sub-comp
