Is there a way to open an AE project to see just the keyframes (for a given clip), without having to open up every frame (no y axis scaling)? I just want to see how some composites look at a certain frame, or how various color passes will play out on different frames. In other words, is there a way to view frames, rather than contents, in after effects? A: You can try out a new feature included in CS6: The ability to preview keyframes as a separate layer. Go to Window > Timeline Layers You will see the layer named "Elements" which is only visible in the Timeline panel. Now you can use the Orbit tool to work on your Elements layer. A very similar feature used to be in earlier versions. It is deprecated in CS6. Preview keyframes in After Effects A: In CS6 you can go to the Timeline panel > select the layer you want to review, select the elements in that layer in the panel's timeline view and then click the Filmstrip button which appears on the right hand side of the panel. Then you can drag in the Filmstrip view to get a "sliced view" of the time in that layer. This allows you to go in and out of a specific layer to get a different view of the scene in that layer. Dalton's Tail-Light Caught Fire In Parking Lot DANVILLE, Ga. — A woman was very thankful when her vehicle was towed away from an Arby's on Sunday night after she found her rental car's tail-light on fire inside the parking lot. According to Danville police, the tail-light of 24-year-old Anna Belle Harris' rental car caught fire as she drove into Arby's at about 7:30 p.m. She pulled her vehicle into a nearby parking lot to get a good look.
