the new vector tools in illustrator are not only better than ever, but also incredibly fast and fluid. the old desktop approach to working with paths in illustrator has been completely overhauled. now all your paths in illustrator are true paths with the ability to edit them as you would edit a line in a drawing program. work is done instantly in illustrator without having to convert to outlines or rasterize the vector paths. even better, when you convert a path to an outline you can still edit it as you would any other object in illustrator. the drawing tools in illustrator are quick and nimble. new pen tools in illustrator include a new bézier curve tool, the elliptical marquee tool, and the freeform tool. these tools are great for copying areas, creating ellipses and circles, and creating custom shapes. the pen tool in illustrator works as you expect it to, but there are a few new features for more precision when using it. the first new feature is the ability to snap the tool directly to the nearest grid or point when you click and drag with the pen. this makes it easy to create straight, curved, or even oscillating shapes. to help you work with illustrator more easily, you can now double-click on a grid or point to place that point or grid in the current shape. one of the best new features in illustrator is the ability to export paths as vector masks. simply go to view & then current masks, select the vector mask option, and choose the output type that you want. the new vector mask export can be used with sketchbook pro and other vector mask layers in other programs.
