More seriously, big international tournaments like the Intel Extreme Masters bring together "stars" from all over the world. But the incentive to watch and follow a gaming tournament is that it involves one of your favorite video game characters. It's much the same with blockbuster movies. Many people know there's a next summer Avengers: Infinity War are very keen. Others are enticed by the spectacle of Star Wars: The Force Awakens, or the anticipation of the next generation of the Divergentbook series. The fact that so many talented people are working on the movie or television show does not influence who would ultimately buy the tickets. That being said, my job is to make it easier for people to find games that they love. Many people create hobbyist games and wish to attract attention to it. This is an altruistic and laudable project. Many interesting and useful games are made to be free software. However, the lack of visibility undermines the job creators. Anyone can download the game, and that means anyone can think about making their own game. As a result, few people think about making games professionally. If you want to contribute to the field, find a large, successful game and hire a non-game designer to make it. Don't hope that a game designer like The Great Ghibli is choosing to spend their time making a gorgeous game that is not suited to their skills and interests. You can certainly hire them for that, but the best designers are busy making games they want to make. Of course, large games are often challenging and laborious to make. That is why we have developed a community to make games for people who don't want to. Anyone can post your own game idea and request to have a playable version, if it's done right. to be clear, i'm not suggesting that the movie industry can't get a slice of the game industry's pie. hollywood does feature several big-time game adaptations, as well as other forms of entertainment (such as the marvel cinematic universe, which has used the properties of both games and movies). but every time a hollywood studio decides to put a big-budget game adaptation on the screen, it's one more opportunity for that studio to say, we're trying something new. and it's one more opportunity for a gaming company to say, oh, we didn't even know hollywood liked our games until we saw this big-budget movie. my friends at ea don't have to worry that i'm going to steal their ip or that i'm going to turn it into a movie. it's a wonderful, unique project, and i'm going to use it to my own advantage. in other words, they can say, we are going to develop a movie based on a game, but instead of just making a film version of a game, we're going to make a film that everyone goes to see. and they can say, we are going to take the game story and make it into a whole new, engaging form of entertainment. and they can say, we have an amazing ip, but it's something that doesn't fit into our gaming business, so we're going to do a film that is specifically designed to go to the movies. and the film industry can say, we are going to make a film about a game, but we're going to make the film in the exact same format and with the exact same look and feel as the game. and they can say, we are going to take a game where there's no plot and no characters, and we're going to put in a whole story, characters, and plot, and we're going to make it into a movie.
