you may also see a white spot on the fruit. this is not a disease but a result of the fruit being exposed to too much moisture. moisture can be caused by overhead watering, poor drainage around your plants, or leaves that are too wet. the best way to prevent moisture damage to the fruit is to water less frequently and more thoroughly. some growers like to cut the fruit off of the tree after they are fully ripened to prevent moisture problems. the fruit can also be covered with a fruit bag, or an old screen or piece of plastic. make sure you use a transparent one. remove the fruit by scraping away the flesh with your fingers, or with a thin-bladed knife. if you plan on selling the fruit, you will want to peel them. peeling can be done with a vegetable peeler or a peach peeler (if it's available at your market). remember that peeling fruit will make it more susceptible to bruising, and to mold. if you will be storing the fruit, then you can peel them before they go into the refrigerator. spray during full bloom and two subsequent sprays at 10 to 14-day intervals to prevent infections of flowers and young fruit. fungicides are also required when the fruit ripens. it is important to begin spraying in 7-day intervals (typically, three times until harvest) when the fruit turns color from green to yellow and red. starting a spray program when rotten fruit is already evident will result in poor disease control. select a fungicide containing captan or propiconazole that is labeled for use on peaches. see spray schematic for peaches below. these fungicides are only effective if complete and thorough coverage of the tree(s) can be obtained. see table 1 for examples of brands and specific fungicide products. always apply all pesticides according to directions on the label. there is a minimum of a one day pre-harvest interval for these fungicides (that is, the time between spraying and harvesting). the listed product containing pyraclostrobin may be sprayed after blooming with a maximum of five applications per season and with a 14-day preharvest interval. 5ec8ef588b
