Adobe has been around since 1987 (and don't forget that Ps had versions before Adobe CS1). While this ain't strange, the profiles (experiences) different folks who don't have Windows or Mac installed. Of course, it takes some maturity. Legally, Adobe can screw up your PC if it wants. All images you work on are precious, and you can't be held responsible if they are lost. For the same reason, you have to take what you get, or pay again. Who knows what Adobe will opt to do as it sells off the Assets, such as purchases -- Adobe is all about selling off assets. Lightroom is a good "quick and dirty" solution for beginners or those who must remain fairly portable in their image workflow. Lightroom has remained consistent for more than a decade, offering a better user experience. If you're a faster-than-Lightroom user, you'll probably be best off with Lightroom as it works in many more platforms, most recently macOS. For professional users, Photoshop has the advantage of being the workhorse, and the developer most familiar with the intricacies of image conversion. Photoshop has consistently outshined Lightroom's own performance in the time since its inception. Lightroom may access Photoshop files, but it has its own database, and it's worth becoming a master for it. Photoshop does a lot less than you think, and with the right tools, you can do almost everything. We didn't touch Photoshop's sophisticated and powerful compositing features, not because we don't think that there's much worth saying about them, but because nobody will be able to answer our question. Adobe Photoshop will remain a top image editing software, especially for web & graphic designers because Photoshop's most popular and powerful feature is its power. Photoshop is the software which is the leader among software development companies.

The launch of the provided Photoshop file size limit is in line with the most recent editions of other Adobe applications, such as the release of the Creative Cloud for 80GB of storage. Adobe is not saying when it will release the 50GB upgrade to video editing applications like Premiere Pro and After Effects. The company is currently focused on providing that upgrade to those applications, but it will make the jump when it is ready. The update also brings the ability to preview and access features natively within the Photoshop app via native macOS APIs. A feature to be built into Adobe apps and Photoshop in the future is to create and view animated gifs. Right now this is limited to Photoshop CC 2015 and later, but the company is exploring adding this functionality natively. The final updates to Photoshop for macOS as a Standalone app are a set of UI improvements, including a flattened grid view of layers, that I'm led to believe were made specifically to make the image editing experience more pleasant to users who don't need all the power of a Photoshop Workflow. The company also made improvements to the way it handles performance-critical features, such as the non-destructive effects. Adobe has announced that it will offer an update to Lightroom CC once the replacement workflow toolkit becomes available for public use. And as promised, Lightroom CC for Windows 10 will be part of the Creative Cloud and 85GB will be the new minimum storage allotment.
